

Preparing and delivering my presentation for Habitly had several challenges. One of the main challenges was organizing all the important information into a five-minute presentation without making the message too long or difficult to understand. I also needed to consider the interests of a potential investor, so I focused not only on the app's features but also on its benefits and possible growth. Another challenge was practicing my delivery so that I could speak clearly and confidently without sounding like I was simply reading from the slides.

I used visual aids to make the presentation easier to follow. I included an infographic showing the main features of Habitly, such as goals, habits, tracking, reminders, and progress. I also used a simple growth chart to show an example of how the number of users could increase over time. For storytelling, I started with a situation that many people can relate to: setting a goal but eventually forgetting to track it or losing motivation. This helped introduce the problem before presenting Habitly as the solution.

For feedback, I received comments that my message was clear, but some parts could be explained more briefly. I was also advised to avoid putting too much information on one slide and to improve my confidence while speaking. I incorporated this feedback by shortening some explanations, using simpler slide content, and focusing more on speaking naturally instead of reading the text. I also practiced my presentation several times to improve my pacing, vocal variety, and non-verbal communication. Overall, this activity helped me understand that an effective presentation is not only about having good information. It is also about organizing the message, using visuals properly, and delivering the ideas clearly to the audience.
